

	Collaboration	Collusion	Feedback
You and a few friends study together for a final exam in your art history course. You decide to create a joint set of flashcards to process all the information. When you take the final exam (online) you are told it is open book and open notes. You also realize that you have very tight timelines to answer each question, so you decide to copy and paste the text from your flashcards.
You ask your friend, who is a tutor in the Writing Center, to read over your paper and give you some hints about it. You want to send it to her by email, but instead, she asks to look it over with you together on paper. She has you write notes in the margins.
You and a friend do your lab work together, as assigned by your lab instructor, but keep separate notes and write your reports separately. You do read each other's reports to make sure you are both on the same track.
You and a classmate did your student observations at the same school in the same classroom. You shared notes with one another since you couldn't possibly have seen everything at once. You use your joint notes to write your individual observational report.
